

Arthur R. Marshall Loxahatchee National Wildlife Refuge
Welcome to Arthur R. Marshall Loxahatchee National Wildlife Refuge, 148,000 acres or 221 square miles, one of over 530 national wildlife refuges that form a network of United States lands and waters managed specifically for wildlife. Refuges provide habitat — food, water, cover, and space — for millions of migratory birds, over 70 endangered species, and thousands of other species of native plants and animals.

The Arthur R. Marshall Loxahatchee National Wildlife Refuge provides habitat and protection for endangered and threatened wildlife such as the American alligator, snail kite, and wood stork. Migratory birds such as neotropical songbirds, secretive marsh birds, shorebirds, and waterfowl winter at the refuge along with year-round resident herons, egrets, and ibis.

Through refuge programs and facilities, visitors can enjoy a variety of educational and wildlife-oriented recreational opportunities. Contact the refuge office for teaching pavilion (chickee) reservations for educational group visits. Public access is available at both the Headquarters Area (off US 441/SR 7) and the Hillsboro Area (at the west end of Loxahatchee Road). The refuge is open to the public from sunrise to sunset every day of the year. Hours are posted at each entrance. The Visitor Center is open 9:00 am - 4:00 pm Monday through Friday, Saturday and Sunday 9:00 am - 4:30 pm, mid-October through April; Wednesday through Friday, Saturday and Sunday 9:00 am - 4:30 pm the rest of the year. The center is closed December 25.

An entrance fee of $5 per vehicle or $1 per pedestrian is charged daily. Golden Age, Golden Access, Golden Eagle, and Duck Stamp annual passes are available upon request. A $12 Refuge Specific Annual Pass and a $15 Golden Eagle Hologram for National Park Service pass upgrades are also available. Entrance fees apply at both refuge entrances.
